PREFACE.

THE annexed Concordance has, of course, no pretensions beyond a book of reference, to assist the investigation and study of the Liturgy, as well as quotation and compilation from it. The single purpose is, to furnish means for a ready, correct, and complete reference on every point of doctrine, devotion, and discipline contained in 'The Book of Common Prayer.' To have collected and classified the subjects under a few heads might have abridged the labour, and perhaps have claimed a higher merit; but there would have been a deficiency of useful detail, and such a plan would not have met the Compiler's view. His wish was—not to make statements, or present doctrines, of his own,—but to supply materials, from which others might collect, arrange, and digest what their object or the occasion required; to place under their view the various terms employed in the Prayer Book, with the extent or limits of each; and to give every facility, copiousness, and accuracy to quotation, judgment, and study, when engaged on that incomparable book. If, therefore, the Concordance appear to any too verbal,—more verbal than significant or serviceable,—while such must in a great measure be the character of every concordance, and nothing would have been more easy than contraction, it seemed important to present in all its variety the phraseology of the Prayer Book—the exact form of expression used—the idiom of the book. Every one knows how a slight variation of expression or quotation may convey a very remote and perverted meaning. It was therefore preferred, that the verbiage should sometimes seem redundant, than at any time deficient; that the same thing should be repeated under several words, than that one idea should be lost; and that, if possible, the right idea be furthered by too many insertions, rather than a wrong or inadequate one be suggested by too few. Hence are inserted some words, small and unimportant per se, but essential and of some force in the place they occupy. Hence also a word is inserted as often as it occurs, and yet may be found likewise under kindred heads. In many cases, less would lead to contracted partial views or erroneous statements, or prove insufficient for the purposes of thorough investigation. At the same time, it is not guaranteed that every word is inserted every time it occurs: but it is believed that every thing material will be readily found.

One result the Compiler would fain hope his work may promote, viz., that polemics, seeing at one view the entire use made by the framers of the Liturgy of any word, or term, or phrase, may be led to employ that word, or term, or phrase, both in the same sense as they find it in the Prayer Book, and also each disputant in the same sense as the other: eschewing a logomachy not less bewildering and endless, than prejudicial to the church. Few things, it is well known, contribute more to contention and division than argument on a word or a subject taken in different senses; each party maintaining their own, and never likely to agree, because they are using like words with different meaning. The Compiler, therefore, will indeed rejoice, if this Concordance be instrumental in promoting precision, and fixing the true sense, or showing the allowed latitude, of controverted terms, to the healing of that strife which is equally mischievous and unwise.

Still more will he rejoice, if the work contribute to manifest and promote the catholic spirit of the Prayer Book: the spirit of Christian peace and unity, love and concord, humility and devotion, knowledge and true godliness, which breathes through this our invaluable manual of worship.

The Contractions are in general, it is hoped, sufficiently plain, but an explanatory list of them is prefixed.

St. Neots, November 1, 1851.
